

Our beloved facilitators have Great Code

Trained facilitators make possible wellbeing through community.

Have you ever gone to another country and seen how people live. Culture is their Code. Another word for Code is norms. Norms are expected behavior to remain a member of a group.

The “ahh, hah” experience of a traveler to another culture is realizing something can be done differently than the way you knew. For example, journeying in Spain from Pamplona to Santiago, a traveler on foot can experience a slowed down pace and realize “ahh, hah - that slowed down pace is possible.”

So too the facilitator leaves behind bad code and replaces it with good code by following our Facilitator Guide, free for members of Loquate. This reinforces Smart® habits that satisfy innate needs. Once you do this, you want to keep doing it more. It is refreshing. One leads to another because it is so good. For example, the “Odd Rule” is to call on others when the facilitator most wishes to speak. The Loquate Smart® group is designed as a flat group. A flat group has no hierarchy.

Actually, what is going on is this. Your spiritual domain is changing at its core. You are facilitating others. This is good code to have a flat group. You as facilitator are not in charge. You and all members surrender to the caring presence outside of yourself. Facilitators practice the Odd Rule, giving power back to the members. The aroma is fragrant to the Spirit. Participant feedback scores at every meeting scientifically verify Spirit-centered community grows through the wellbeing of participants.

Man was meant to live in community. Each Smart® group member in turn is facilitator. Smart® facilitators bring wellbeing through community. They make where they work a best place to work. They make a community where they live a best place to live.

Freedom to live our deepest beliefs in harmony with all mankind is the outcome. This occurs by satisfying innate needs.
